The moon was shining brightly and tionery, by its light she saw the hyenas, two of Ambulance and emergency, them-wolves as they are called in Apportionment, board of South Africa-long grey creatures that Assessors, salaries, etc., prowled round the thorn fence hun- Assessors, block maps, grily, causing the oxen that were tied Bonds, Betterment, to the trek tow and the horses picket- Bonds, Improvement ed on the other side of the waggon to Bonds, Municipal low and whinny in an uneasy fashion. Bonds, Re-issue, The hyenas saw her also, for her head Bonds, Improvement No. 2. rose above the rough fence, and being Bonds, Voting Machine, sowardly beasts, slunk away. She Bridges, Superintendent of could have shot them if she chose, but Building Commissioners did not, first because she hated killing Building Laws, Revision of anything unnecessarily, even a wolf, City Attorney, and secondly because it would have aroused the camp. So she contented herself with throwing more dry wood on the fire, stepping over the Kaffirs who slept like logs, in order to do so. Then, resting upon her gun like some Amazon on guard, she gazed a while at the lovely moonlit sea, and the long line of game trekking silently to their drinking place, until seeing no more of the wolves or other dangerous beasts, she turned and sought her bed again. She was thinking of Mr. Ishmael and his zebra-skin trousers; wondering why the man should have filled her with such an unreasoning dislike. If she had disliked him at a distance of fifty paces, how she would hate him when he was near! And yet he was Health, Hunters' licenses, diers of fortune of whom she had met Interest on funded debt, several, who took to the wilderness as Library fund, a last resource, and by degrees sank Lights. to the level of the savages among Liquor and dog agent whom they lived, a person who was Main street, new macadam, not worth a second thought. So she Memorial Day, tried to put him from her mind, and by way of an antidote, since still she could not sleep, filled it with her recollections of Richard Darrien. Some years had gone by since they had met, and from that time to this she had never heard a word of him in which she could put the slightest faith. She did not even know whether he were alive or dead, only she believed that if he were dead she would be aware of it. No, she had never heard of him, and it seemed probable that she never would hear of him again. Yet she did not believe that either. Had she done so her happiness-for on the whole Rachel was a happy girl-would have departed from her, since this once-seen lad had never left her heart, nor had she forgotten their farewell

Reflecting thus, at length Rachel fell off to sleep and began to dream, still of Richard Darrien. It was a long dream whereof afterwards she could remember but little, but in it there were shoutings, and black faces, and the flashing of spears; also the white man Ishmael was present there. One part, however, she did remember; Richard Darrien, grown taller, changed and yet the same, leaning over her, warning her of danger to come, warning her against this man Ishmael. She awoke suddenly to see that the light of dawn was creeping into her tent, that low, soft light which is so beautiful in Southern Africa. Rachel was disturbed, she felt the need of action, of anything that would change the current of her thoughts. No one was about yet. What should she do? She knew; the sea was not more than a mile away, she would go down to it and bathe, and be back before the rest of them were awake. CHAPTER V.

Noie.

That a girl should set out alone to bathe through a country inhabited chiefly by wild beasts and a few wandering savages, sounds a somewhat dangerous form of amusement. So it was indeed, but Rachel cared nothing for such dangers, in fact she never even thought of them. Long ago she had discovered that the animals would not harm her if she did not harm them, except perhaps the rhinoceros, which is given to charging on sight, and that was large and could generally be discovered at a distance. As for elephants and lions, or even buffalo, her experience was that they ran away, except on rare occasions when they stood still, and stared at her Nor was she afraid of the savages who always treated her with the utmost respect, even if they had never seen her before. Still, in case of accidents she took her double-barrelled gun, loaded in one barrel with ball, and in the other with loopers or slugs, and awakened Tom, the driver, to tell him where she was going. The man stared at her sleepily, and murmured a remonstrance, but taking no heed of him she pulled out some thorns from the fence to make a passage, and in another minute was lost to sight in the morning mist. Following a game-path through the dew-drenched grass which grew upon the swells and valleys of the veld, and passing many small buck upon her way, in about twenty minutes, just as the light was really beginning to grow, Rachel reached the sea. It was dead calm, and the tide chancing to be out, she found where there would be no fear of sharks that never stay in such a spot, fearing lest they should be stranded. Slipping off her clothes she plunged into the cool and crystal water and began to swim round and across the pool, for at this art she was expert, diving and playing like a sea-nymph. Her bath done she dried herself with a towel she had brought, all except her long, fair hair, which she left loose for the wind to blow on, and having dressed, stood a while waiting to see the glory of the sun rising from the ocean. Whilst she remained thus, suddenly the heard the sound of horses galloping towards her, two of them, she could tell that from the hoof beats, although the low-lying mists made them invisible. A few more seconds and they emerged out of the fog. The first thing that she saw were stripes which caused her to laugh thinking that she had mistaken zebras for horses. Then the laugh died on her lips as she recognised that the stripes were those of Mr. Ishmael's trousers. Yes, there was no doubt about it, Mr. Ishmael, wearing a rough coat instead of his lion skin, but with the rest of his attire unchanged, was galloping down upon her furiously, leading a wet and dishevelled hair. Rachel threw the towel over it, whence it hung like an old Egyptian head-dress, setting her beautiful face in a most becoming frame. Next she picked up the double-barrelled gun and cocked it, for she misdoubted her of this man's intentions. Not many modern books came her way, but she had read stories of young women who were carried off by force.

For an instant she was frightened, but as she lifted the hammer of the second barrel her constitutional courage returned.

"Let him try it," she thought to herself "If he had come ten minherself "If he had come awful, but utes ago it would have been awful, but now I don't care." By this time Mr. Ishmael had arrived, and was dragging his horse to its haunches; also she saw that evidently he was much more frightened than she had been. The man's handsome face was quite white, and his lips were trembling. "Perhaps that rhinoceros is after him again,"thought Rachel, then added alound quietly: "What is the matter?"

"Forgive me," he answered in a rich, and, to Racher's astonishment, perfectly educated voice, "forgive me for disturbing you. I am ashamed, but it is necessary. The Zulus—" and he paus-
